Honey is a browser extension that helps you find coupons from “all over the internet” to reduce the price a user spends on any given online purchase. The extension works by asking users before checkout to click a button to “search the web for coupons”, seconds after, the user gets either a coupon of any amount (from 5% all the way to 90% off coupons in rare cases) or a message saying no coupons were found. Both selections request the user to click the extension pop up to either “Apply Coupon”, or close honey with the message “Got It”.

I have personally used Honey, and it has helped me save significant amounts of money.

7 days ago, YouTuber MegaLag uploaded a video showcasing three (3) different ways in which Honey was scamming its influencer sponsors, most content creators, and their clients.

The Situation Explained: A significant amount of online creators, such as YouTubers or influencers, make a living by promoting specific products to their audience and then providing affiliate links; so when someone watches their content, and proceeds to purchase a product directly from their thumbnail, a portion of the sale, a commission, is then given to the creator who promoted the product. In some cases affiliate links even work for a period of time such as a week or a month after clicking it, so if in that time frame the user goes back and decides to buy the product, the creator still gets paid. Now, a lot of these creators are sponsored by Honey as it seemed like a win-win-win scenario; where the creator receives the sponsorship, promotes a product, promotes a service that helps people save money when buying said products; Honey receives publicity and new users; and the audience gets to purchase products at a discount whilst still supporting their favorite creators. Too good to be true. At this point, you’re probably thinking, well... How does Honey make money, then? As it turns out, whenever people clicked “Apply Coupon” the affiliate link was sneakily changed from the creator’s affiliate code, to PayPal’s affiliate code, so PayPal got paid, not the creator (#1). To make matters even worse, whenever no coupons were found and users clicked the message that read “Got It” the affiliate link also changes from the creator’s to PayPal’s (#2). This is a lot of money from a lot of creators. Now, the icing on the cake is that this isn’t the only way Honey makes money. The other part of their business model is that their promise statement of searching for coupons from “all over the internet” is a flat out lie. Honey partners with online retailers and corporations to assure products on their platform only be affected by certain coupons or select coupons instead of the best coupons (#3). Even worse is that this forces small businesses to partner with them, since they have a mafia style approach to reducing your sale revenue if you don’t buy their display only select coupons service.

At the moment nothing more than articles and the YouTube community calling them out has occurred but given they are part of PayPal which is a pretty established company, we should be seeing more from this news in the near future. Fuck em man.

REVIEW

AUDIOSLAVE AUDIOSLAVE

SUPERGROUP

Audioslave is synonym of power. Every band has its own energy, but Audioslave stands above normal. Imma let you know beforehand, it will get loud. It is cathartic, as you try to let go off your own thoughts through a wall of sound made up by guitar riffs and heavy drums breaks. And then my favorite performance comes from the singer. His vocals are pure raw emotion. You could even notice how the singer push his vocal range as far as he's humanly able. In my opinion, Audioslave is the ultimate Hard Rock band. As they bring to the mortal world all the chaos in their mind to make art. It will shock you. Because it is super stable. Even in moments when you are witnessing pure anger from Audioslave. You will witness something beautiful happen inside of you as you listen to this record track by track. To me Audioslave is a safe place. This domain of ultimate awareness where you are not able to stand the world trying to take advantage of you. Now you wake up and let go from whatever is not letting you be yourself. There are going to be moments when you would channel all the thoughts inside of you that will fuel Audioslave purpose.

The combination of Rage Against the Machine backbone and Soundgarden frontman is unreal, otherworldly—maybe a construct of my imagination—but is as real as it gets. I would like to make an honorable mention to the guitar player totally unorthodox that is able to cast, emulate, and control the songs as a DJ would with his guitar. I mean he scratches, chops himself on the spot, and is a master of guitar effects. There are going to be moments when you are not sure if you are only listening to a 4-piece rock band. But Imma let you know that that's the only thing happening. So, yes, it is as good as I'm telling you. I praise them. Just try to sing them songs. Play along them in your instrument of choice. And just try to push yourself as hard as Audioslave does. You feel that release—even in chaos, you are able to recognize the little order there is outside of yourself.

I would have loved the opportunity to be part of an Audioslave concert. Of course, I mean just witness them. Yet, we are so fucking lucky to have open access to live performances and recordings because of modern streaming platforms. In my opinion this album is a FAT 100% it holds no flops. But since I don't have an actual chance of watching them play live, I will rate Audioslave debut album a 94/100. Calculations  $2+4=6$   $100-6=94/100$ .
